Envisioning Your Future

You are at your retirement party years from now and your friends and family are giving speeches to celebrate you and your lifetime accomplishments. One by one, they go onstage to share what they admire most about you — your greatest personality traits, the cool things you did in your life, the ways in which you made the world a better place.

How do you want these people to describe you?

What kind of person do you want to have become?

What exceptional personality traits do you want to have embodied through your life?

Write everything down that comes to mind — don’t hold back. Have fun with it!

________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________
________________________________________________________________________

Now that you have a vision of who you want to become, the next big question is …

What can you do today to start becoming that person?

You don’t choose how you’re going to die, but you choose how you’re going to live … starting now. So from now on, focus every day on thinking and acting as the version of yourself that you’ve envisioned. And sooner than you think, you will have become that person.

Make it happen and great things will happen in your life!